8.1.

Human rights organisations have hit out at local authorities for threatening people with fines for sleeping rough by using so-called PSPOs. Public Space Protection Orders were introduced in 2014 and give councils powers to fine people for behaviour that would not normally be considered criminal. The councils say the orders were introduced to tackle anti-social behaviour but homeless charities say they risk making things tougher for already vulnerable people.

8.2.

An eccentrically behaving bird in Queensland has become an internet sensation, but scientists say this is normal behaviour for a Bush Stone Curlew. Nick Wiggins from ABC News photographed the bird inanimately gawking at its reflection in a window at Queensland University. This behaviour is not uncommon for Curlews given that they are known to hide in highly camouflaged areas by standing still. However, Kevin J. McGowan, a biologist at the Cornell Lab of Ornithology, says he's not sure what this Curlew wants to do to/with the 'other' bird.

8.3.

Dr Kimmel, the author of "Guyland", a study of young male friendships, explains the revolution that has happened in the way men relate to each other. According to him, this revolution manifests itself in the growing need for time alone with a special male friend. It can be seen as a way to avoid adult responsibility or explained by the cultural change that has put men and women on an equal footing, Dr Kimmel believes. It used to be an all-male world, but now that women have – according to some men – 'invaded' that world, bromance is formed as a defence.

8.4.

In the Youth Allies for Sustainability Leadership Program, young residents of Santa Fe, New Mexico, are raising awareness of environmental sustainability and social justice among young people. The students and staff of the program have developed various avenues to promote their cause to local government and educational decision-making forums. For instance, they have founded a nine-person Youth Advisory Board that works alongside the Mayor-appointed City of Santa Fe Sustainability Commission. Also, the Youth Board engages additional youth in civic engagement trainings that address critical community needs focused on sustainable community development.

If you're nearing the end of your first job, be aware that the way you resign can have a major impact on your reputation. In fact, nearly nine in ten human resources managers say that how you quit affects your future career opportunities, according to a recent survey. While it may be tempting, refrain from confiding in co-workers that you're planning to quit before telling your superior about it. Moreover, it's essential to give your superior a notice that is reasonable for your industry and workload, says Amy Glaser, senior vice president at worldwide employment agency Adecco Staffing. "If you have a lot on your plate, sometimes even a month's notice is appropriate," she adds.
