Hello, this is James Conrad. It has taken me the best part of a week to get around to unpacking from what has become an annual music and merry-making trip to the Scottish islands each summer. The explosion of events over the last decade has created a busy calendar that would need a helicopter to navigate. The first such festival, launched 21 years ago, created an appetite for turning a trip to a music festival into a mini-holiday that requires staying in a hotel for several nights.

Cars have been remotely hacked. You may have read it was a so-called “software problem” that allowed hackers to remotely take control of a car. That claim by manufacturers doesn’t hold water. That’s not the most fundamental reason for the weakness. These cars were hacked because the same computer that handles each vehicle’s Internet connectivity for entertainment and navigation also handles the engine and steering. Automakers decided to go for minor cost reductions by installing one computer instead of two. Two would have allowed for isolation of the control of the engine from everything but a high-energy electromagnetic pulse. Virtually anything that connects to the Internet can be hacked. Cars are described by security experts as a tangible risk.

We arrived at the banks of a river and saw a small hut with an Albanian flag flying in front of it. The hut had a hand-operated cable system attached to a floating wooden platform. This hand-operated cable was to be used for the short journey across the water to Butrint, a UNESCO World Heritage site dating from 8 BC. Butrint is considered one of the best preserved Greek archaeological sites in Europe. Despite my doubts, this so-called ferry did manage to get us and our car across.

Stansted Airport is the UK’s fourth busiest airport. Workers who operate security scanners for checked luggage at this airport are ready to go on strike tomorrow in a row over pay. Remember that tomorrow is a Bank Holiday Monday – one of the busiest travel days of the summer. Around 30 employees, all luggage security scanners, are taking industrial action to support their claim for a three per cent pay rise. The airport said in a statement on its website: “If planned industrial action by members of the union goes ahead, it is unlikely there will be any disruption to passenger services. The company has confirmed it has appropriate alternative plans in place to meet any scenarios.” Well, I have to remark that the last time I went through Stansted I thought the service couldn’t possibly get any worse!

Pencils. Pens. Notebooks. School clothes. They all add up. But soon parents have a chance to save a few dollars when they go back-to-school shopping for their children next fall. Ohio has enacted a law granting a one-time sales-tax break on clothing and school supplies for the month of August. These items can then all be sold without sales tax. This will save buyers about seven percent on school purchases. And retailers will benefit from increased sales. Both groups should be happy then.
